A. We know that a phonograph record's sound is stored in the wavy grooves on its surface. In the recording studio, the music is first recorded on tape. The musicians and studio technicians listen to the tape. After making any needed adjustments in the balance between the instruments and voices, the tape is played into a record-cutting machine, which cuts a continuous groove onto a revolving plastic disc. From this disc, a metal record is made. The metal record is used in a plastic molding press to press the wavy groove onto the plastic record you buy.
